- How are the facts and definition of key concepts interpreted by the relevant parties? Why do they believe the problem exists? What do they think is the solution?
- When did events important to the situation occur, and when does a decision need to be made to address the identified problems?

Seeking more information can frequently resolve many issues, and outside advice can be as helpful in clinical ethics as in other aspects of patient care. Conferring with others can provide new perspectives and new options. However, uncertainty about some aspects of the question may be unavoidable, and the problem is likely to need a response even when it is impossible to know basic related facts.

Step 3. Identify relevant professional ethical codes, ethical practice standards, and ethical principles, and where conflict may exist between them.

Although every patient encounter is unique, much about ethical patient care can be described in general terms. Determining whether the issue in question is addressed by the AOA, in either the Code of Ethics, the Standards of Conduct, or a resolution from the House of Delegates, may provide a starting point for consideration if not a definitive action plan. Similarly, relevant state and federal law may provide some general guides for action. (See Chapter 1 on the limited applicability of the law in ethical analysis.) If there is conflict between formal authoritative statements on the issue in question, consider the principles that the statements reflect, and whether there is any hierarchy among them. How do specific standards relate to other important values and standards; i.e., is any standard more important than others and why?

Step 4. Identify the possible alternative courses of action and their likely outcomes.

Considering the goals that are most important to achieve and the standards of behavior that are most important to follow, outline a best case, worst case, and middle ground scenario. Determine whether the means (the

- Authors of Textbooks are teaching the same course at their university and have min. a Ph.D.
- The books are reviewed by Professors of a similar background
- A formal Peer review process have been implemented and are being rolled out

"I liked and downloaded some titles which are relevant to courses I am teaching here at the University."

The books are well written and of high quality. In a relatively small size, we find all the most essential material."

Dr Jordan Stoyanov, Newcastle University

"I have looked at a number of your books and am impressed with your concept and quality"
